In the case of Balfour v Balfour (1919) 2 KB 571. In this case, Mr. Balfour was a contract i lly term agreement eed to give his wife e $30 a month as maintenance while he was living in Ceylon on (Sri Lanka) once he left
 , they separated
 and Mr. Balfour stopped payment
 s. Mrs. Balfour brought an action to enforce the payments. The court held that there was no enforceable agreement as there was not enough evidence to suggest that they were intending to be legally bound by the promise.

uence, invol ves one person taking an advantage of a position of power over another person. The law presumes that certain kinds of relationships, such as between parent and child, solicitor and client, employer and employee, are relationships in which one party is in a position of special confidence and trust in relation to the other. In such cases, the law imposes a duty on the person in the position of special confidence to act in the best interests of the other party, and not in their own interests. If a person in a position of special confidence breaches this duty, they may be liable for breach of fiduciary duty. This is a civil wrong, and the remedy is an injunction or damages. In some cases, a person in a position of special confidence may also be liable for criminal offenses, such as fraud or theft. The law also imposes a duty on persons in positions of special confidence to disclose any conflicts of interest. If a person in a position of special confidence fails to do so, they may be liable for breach of fiduciary duty. This is a civil wrong, and the remedy is an injunction or damages. In some cases, a person in a position of special confidence may also be liable for criminal offenses, such as fraud or theft. The law also
